Special to The Christian Science Monitor from its Western News Office

CHICAGO, Illinois-The Webb Pomerene Act, after a year's trial, is proving an effective instrument for furthering overseas trade, and both large and small manufacturing concerns are forming combinations for export purposes under this law, according to a statement made by John Walsh, former chief counsel of the Federal Trade Commission, made at pleted as Soon as Funds Are the recent national foreign trade con-Available Says Chief Engineer vention here. "The ultimate success or failure comprises about five and one-half per rests very largely on our business men," he declared. "If the law is to serve as a vehicle for commercial aggrandizement, to benefit the strong at the expense of the weak, or if it is to be used for selfish and unscrupulous exploitation of foreign markets, or for the purpose of manipulating domestic prices, then the expectations of the high-minded and broad-visioned men who were its sponsors would be shamefully thwarted and foiled."

The Webb Act, he pointed out, has a provision dealing with unfair methods of competition. This provision, he said, extends to unfair methods of competition used in export trade against competitors engaged in export trade, even though the acts constituting such unfair methods are done without the territorial jurisdiction of the United States.

"To all appearances competitive business methods in international trade will be scrutinized much more closely in the future than in the past.

All were agreed that the employers' groups must as soon as possible be officially informed of the demands for the eight-hour working day and the English week.

"The intervention of all politicians must be excluded, no matter who they may be," some one exclaimed. "We are quite of your opinion, comrade,' declared the members of the staff of the confédération. The delegates applauded heartily and this first day of the conference ended with a wonderful unanimity of feeling, a commission of five delegates being appointed to draw up an order of the day which would reveal the sentiments of the NEW YORK TEACHERS syndicalists on the question of the tax on salaries.

The next meeting was devoted to the discussion of the eight-hour working day, and the national committee of the Confédération Générale du Travail finished its work on March 25, by unanimously adopting the following resolutions

'The subject of government owner recently, but not nearly as much as the importance of the subject justifies, notwithstanding our previous experience and that of the United States Great Britain. If government ownership and operation of railways is to be attempted on a large scale the situation is full of danger which cannot be avoided, or even minimized except by rigorously independent and non-political administration, which is at least difficult to establish under our system of government. This fact, however, can only be obvious, that in obtain a correct appreciation of the results of government operation of the systems which are or which may hereafter come into its possession than by their being administered in strict accordance with the laws of the country under which other companies have accounting methods being made as precise and as accurate as the law now requires for private corporations, and by the exact financial results being submitted to Parliament each year. I am satisfied the government recognizes these difficulties, and that a sin cere and determined effort will be made to meet the situation. It would seem, however, to be obviously wise that the assumption of further obligation should at least be deferred until the practicability of government administration, or administration under the aegis of the government, which is quite inseparable from government ownership, has been demon-

Stanislaus Adamski. a high authority on all financial and economic affairs and a most capable business organizer: He has given a representative of The Christian Science Monitor an account of the wonderful development of this cooperative movement which has flourished in the face of the most determined opposition on the part of the Prussian, Government, which saw that the movement was strengthening and uniting the Poles, making them financially and economically independent of Prussia.

The movement began in 1872 with the establishment of financial institutions designed to protect the Poles against usurers, by lending money to To Buy From Anglo-Saxon members at reasonable rates. Loans are made to small farmers to enable them to buy additional land or farm machinery, to build houses and barns and not infrequently even to provide a dowry for their daughters. These loans are repaid in small installments. The banks also lend money to small storekeepers who are able to buy their stocks much cheaper for cash, and so can well afford to pay a low rate of interest on the loan. The largest single institution is the Industry Bank in Posen, with deposits of 90,000,000 marks. Its business is chiefly with the large landowners and manufacturers, who are often glad to be able to borrow money on reasonable terms. When the financial organizations were well started other cooperative societies were gradually added, prin-

CALCUTTA, India-Addressing the mperial Legislative Council at Delhi short while since, Sir Claude Hill, he home member of the Government of India, entered into an interesting on of the progress and results of the attempted regulation of the ment and prices of foodstuffs in india during the past few months. The immediate occasion for these measures was the unfavorable character of the on in 1918, and the most imporant step taken in this connection was ibit all export of food grains rom India. Up to this time large uantities of wheat had been exported o the west, especially for the support and upkeep of the British and Indian Now, however, all export of vheat was forbidden, steps were taken o give India the first call upon all exorted Burma rice, and finally arents were made for the import Australian wheat into India. It is hoped to receive 600,000 tons of Australian wheat by next July.

'A position has now been reached,' said Sir Claude Hill, "at which no food grains will leave India, except in very mited quantities and for exceptionally ong reasons. In such circumstances ve were able to contemplate a relaxaon of the restrictions which had been placed on the movement of foodstuffs vithin India. The imposition of these rictions dates back to the time when, in order to facilitate the purhase for the royal commission and at the same time to protect the Indian consumer against the undue inflation of prices, it was found necessary to bit the movements of wheat from But the main cause which led to the regulation of the raffic in foodstuffs was, as His Excelency the Viceroy explained in this acil last September, the congesion on the railways which, owing to he enormous quantity of military mal, and the large number of troops which had to be transported, formed very serious difficulty in providing es for the movement of the mmodities essentially required by he civil population.

GIRL SCOUT PARADE IN CITY OF BOSTON

Review by Sir Robert Baden-Powell and His Sister, Who Organized Girl Guides in England — International Mission

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor BOSTON, Massachusetts-In pursuance of his plan to unite girls of all tries in a "Girl Scout and Girl ide League of Nations," Sir Robrt Baden-Powell, known as the Chief f all Scouting, will review and ad-ress 3000 Massachusetts Girl Scouts Boston today. This idea of estabshing an international council is nderstood to be one of the underlying tives of Sir Robert's present tour of Canada and the United States. Reception and Parade

The reception to the scout leaders will be noteworthy. The 3000 girls will gather in the forenoon at the armory, where they will eat luncheon prepared by themselves. In the aftern they will march to Commonwealth Avenue, where the reviewing stand is located. Besides the visitors, Calvin Coolidge, Governor of Massaetts; Andrew J. Peters, Mayor of Boston; A. Lawrence Lowell, president of Harvard University, and other ials and educators have been invited to occupy places in the stand. There will also be a notable repreentation of national and state officers of the scout organization. After he parade the girls will march back to the armory, where Sir Robert will eak to them. In the evening a group of Girl Scouts will demonstrate their efficiency in one branch of scout activity by cooking and serving a dinner for Sir Robert.

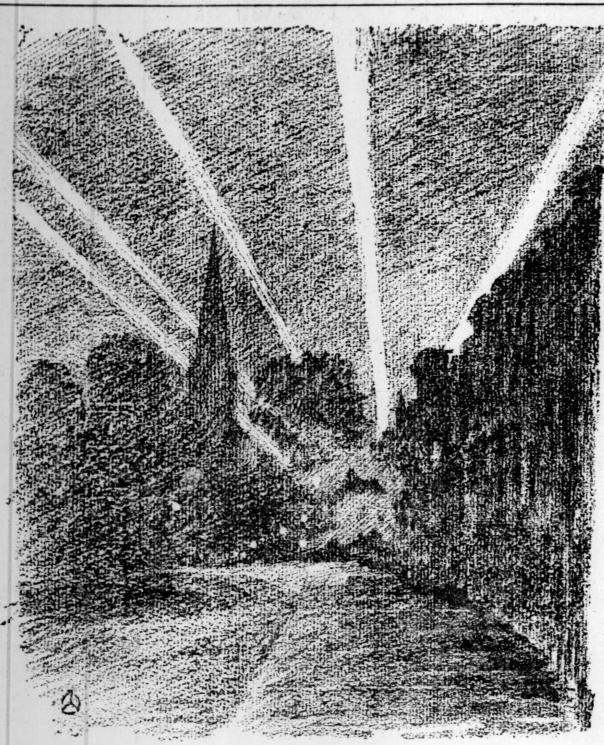

Over 40,000 Girl Scouts

Formation of an International Council is regarded as a natural developnt of the Girl Scout idea. The spreading of the movement beyond Great Britain began through the inerest in the Girl Guides of Mrs. Juliette Low, American wife of an Englishman. Mrs. Low, on revisiting n 1912 her native city of Savannah, orgia, found that the girls there had once again serving in like capacity. and no organization to encourage such activity. She therefore organized a Girl Guides patrol, and on her return in 1913 found that it had grown so rapidly that it seemed advisable to rapidly that it seemed advisable to make it a national organization, the name of which was later made the Since then it has increased until today the membership is more than 40,000, with patrols in 509 ities and towns of the United States. is significant that by far the most rapid period of growth was in the year immediately following the entry of ne United States into the war; for the Girl Guides and Scouts, no less than elves whole-heartedly to the service of the allied cause. Anti-Saloon League Study of Conditions in Norwich, New York, Reveals Great Improvement Under the Dry Régime

Special to The Christian Science Monitor from its Eastern News Office

NORWICH, New York-Prohibition has brought prosperity to Norwich. New York, according to Abner B. Brown, attorney for the Anti-Saloon League of New York State, who recently made a study of economic conditions here during the six months the dry law has been effective. Mr. Brown paid particular attention to the effect of prohibition on manufacturing, employment, banking, and taxes; he also gathered comparative figures on indictments and convictions for crime during the wet régime and under the present dry rule. Assisted by Sen. S. A. Jones, he followed up a number of predictions of the wets, anticipating failure of the new era, and proved that none of them had come true.

There are about twelve hundred workers employed in a half dozen plants in Norwich, the majority of whom are reported to be satisfied with present conditions. Mr. Brown says that employers and men are working in greater cooperation than ever before, and that conditions in the shops are at a high standard. It is reported that the banks also are registering prosperity, for on Nov. 1, 1918, the savings banks showed a total of $2 .-$83,000 in deposits, and on March 14, OTTAWA, Ontario - During the 1919, they reported $3,142,000, or a months of September and October,

In this connection the men who have successively ruled over the college community as director must be mentioned. Sir George Grove was the first. He threw himself wholeheartedly into the life of the place, his resignation in 1894 being deeply regretted by all concerned. His successor, Sir Hubert Parry, was one of the greatest men of his time, both in character and music, and the position he held in the hearts of all who knew him was unique. It is of happy augury for the college that Dr. H. P. Allen-who has just succeeded him as director-should have been one of his closest friends.

Few things are more valuable to students than to have their successor, the Royal College of minds awake to other subjects besides naturally companionable to their own. Schmitt, the distinguished French composer, gave special point to the Classical Concert Society's recent program at the Wigmore Hall. Mr. Schmitt brought with him only one novelty, a song entitled "A Star, which proved unusually elusive and difficult of assimilation. Preceding it on the program, was the altogether lovely "Le fils de la vierge"; both songs were rendered with real perception by Miss Olga Haley, the composer himself accompanying. A fine performance was given of his great quintet for piano and strings-one of the most important contributions to chamber music during recent years. In this Mr. Schmitt took the pianoforte String Quartet. The work is extraordinarily rich in harmonic color, and tate, though the three movements are of quite inordinate length, the interest is sustained throughout. Two contra-It is dictory influences are reflected in the a pronounced adherent of classical tradition. But, taken as a whole, the quintet stands as a splendid manifestation of his complex art, and succeeds to an unlooked-for extent in reconciling the old and the new. The Allied String Quartet opened this very interesting program with Mozart's last quartet in F major. This, it may be noted, was one of the three quartets composed for the King of Prussia, whose favorite instrument was the violoncello. That Mozart was here marking out new grounds for conquest is evident, and a great critic has acutely said that this quartet "is one of the few Eighteenth Century works in this genre that sets us thinking of Beethoven." The dashing character and beauty of the music were well set forth by Mr. Defauw and his col-

There are many stories of the precocity of Mozart, but perhaps the following, relating to a time when the child was not yet seven years old, are less familiar than most and deserve to be told anew. One day Wenzl, who was an able violinist, came to Mozart's father to ask his opinion of six trios he had just composed. It was agreed that they should be tried. Mozart père took the bass, Weinzl the first violin, and Schachtner, trumpeter to the Archbishop of Salzburg, the second. But at this point the young Mozart begged so earnestly to be allowed to take this last part, that his father at length consented to let him perform on his little violin, assisted by the good Schachtner, who had inhow his son could acquit himself on this instrument, and was astonished trios.

The Lesson of Glen Mullet

THERE is a well known proverb, which has been worn almost threadbare on the political platform, to the effect that the happiest country is that which has no history. The saving is a tolerably fair specimen of the "gorgeous generality." In other words, if you search its facets it will be found to possess one which reflects a truism; for the rest, there is an epigram as old as the time of Cæsar. "Ab interitu naturam abhorrere," adopted by Rabelais in the phrase, nature abhors a vacuum. If all this were really true national happiness would have to be sought in e golden age of Chinese quietism: then, says the sage, "Men were satisfied with whatever food and raiment they could obtain. They lived simple and peaceful lives. Neighboring districts were within sight, and the cocks and dogs of the one could be heard in the other, yet the people never interchanged visits.

Now all of this is the very reverse of the conditions which obtain, and which always have obtained in Ireland. It is clear that there were no Donnybrooks nor Sinn ein parliaments in the golden age in Meng. But does nybody really suppose that O'Donnell would have been happier than he is sitting silently at his cabin door in Ballyhooley and waiting for the cocks of Killaloe to wake the morning. Slowly the world is beginning to learn that nankind inhabits a world not of material phenomena but of ideas. It was an Irishman, a bishop of Clovne, who first drew the attention of the country vehemently to the fact, yet Ireland seems to be the last part of the British Commonwealth, as Queen Elizabeth called it, likely to grasp it. All New York is crowding, and wisely crowdng, evening after evening into the Belasco theater to witness that marvelous thing, an Irish comedy, in which the actors play like real Irishmen, and in which the atmosphere is not that of Baltimore, Boston, or the Bowery, at merely of Clare, Galway, or Kerry. Nightly these audiences applaud vigorously the engrafted political sentiments which alone endanger the true ring of the play. And then they go home without a suspicion of the true inwardness of the performance, namely, that Ireland remains Ireland because from Blarney to Derry the ideals of Chicago are routed before those of Glen Mullet.

Any person who knows the difference between the Boyne and the Shannon, knows where the ideals associated with "King Billy" conflict with those associated with Patrick Sarsfield. For centuries there has been "black enmity between the brood of the Orange and the Wild Geese. There was reason enough once, in the opinion of both sides, for accentuating the strife; but the hedgeschool has given place to Maynooth, and the shipping laws to the quays of Limerick and Cork. No sane Englishman wishes to defend the past, but then no sane Irishman should forget the argument of Glen Mullet. It is the boast of Ireland that the planter has always become ore Irish than the Irish, and that some of the most enthusiastic Nationalists are to be found amongst the descendants of those dour Ironsides, whom Cromwell eft to garrison "the pale": the "uncrowned king" himself vas a child of the garrison.

All this being so, and most unquestionably being so, it is obvious that there must be something more than the sword of Strongbow, of Cromwell, or of Dutch William, which has entered into the making of the situation. Strongbow came into Ireland, but the Conqueror came nto England; Cromwell stormed Drogheda, but he rode down the Cavaliers at Naseby: William chased James out of Ireland, but he had previously chased him out of England, the scene on the pier at Kinsale had already been anticipated by a similar one at Whitehall stairs. In precisely the same way the struggle between the North and the South had found a parallel in Scotland in the onflict between the Highlands and the Lowlands. Drogheda was no worse than Glencoe, the Boyne had resounding echo at Culloden. The parliament in Edinburgh was digested by Westminster before that of Dublin was swallowed. The reformation was fought as fiercely and as brutally on either side of the Cheviots as on either of the Irish Channel. How, then, is it that Great Britain is a united country and Ireland a discordant one?

The answer is extremely simple. The fact is that the Irish have never demonstrated the integrity of the ther nations of the Commonwealth." At every crisis in their history the traitor, the informer, or at any rate the dissident has made his appearance on the scene. It is not necessary to go beyond the memory of those today playing an active part in Irish politics to prove this. The tory of what Mr. T. P. O'Connor describes as "The Great Betrayal" has been graphically told by Mr. A. M. Sullivan under the title of "The Brass Band." Every man knows how the guilt of the Phœnix Park was brought home by an informer, and how the Parnellite party was split in two over the great divorce case, whilst v today the voters have deserted "Nationalism" en masse to flock to the standard of Sinn Fein. This, in a microcosm, is the story of the history of Ireland since the days of Strongbow, and it is nothing more than a petition of the failure of the country to stand by the O'Neils or of the treachery which caused the people to be bought and sold in the Union.

And now, at last, the Great War appears to have supplied the cement. And if only what may be termed the Donnybrook element in Ireland can be curbed the reconciliation may be complete. There are men like Sir Horace Plunkett and Sir Hugh Gough, bone of the bone, and flesh of the flesh of "the garrison," who are just as desirous of seeing a united and prosperous Ireland as Captain Redmond and Professor de Valera. But Sir Horace knows well enough that you can never have a united Ireland, so long as every time one political party approaches success another tries to rob it of that success by painting a new moon on a new banner. The desertion of the anti-Parnellites ruined the Parnellite movement as completely as the opposition of the Sinn Feiners wrecked Mr. Redmond and the Nationalists. And it is just as certain as can be, if the old order does not change, that Mr. de Valera will, like Mr. Parnell, meet his Mr. Dillon, just as Mr. Dillon, in turn, met his Mr. de Valera.

O'Donnell and MacDonnell, in other words, have got to become and remain friends as a preliminary step to the prosperity of the country.

Relief in the Assembling of Congress

MEMBERS of the Sixty-Sixth United States Congress are evidently planning to meet the President more than halfway in his effort to get the legislative business of the country going again by May 19. There will be few absentees when the extraordinary session is called to order on that day. Senate Reupublicans, in particular, are taking steps to have every member present on their side, for, with a bare majority of two, they mean to take no chances in the organization of the body, and they have called a conference for May 14, at which they will settle the preliminaries of their legislative program. Both Republicans and Democrats welcome the date of assembly in extraordinary session as earlier than had generally been expected, but the advance of the date is taken to mean that the President has sacrificed his wish to be present at the opening in favor of speedier action on those important bills in default of which certain of the government departments are feeling considerable embarrassment. So far as the country at large is concerned, there will be only a feeling of relief that Congress is at length taking up the matters that have so urgently required its attention.

While the treaty of peace, which involves the League of Nations plan, will be the matter of greatest moment to come before the Senate, it is probable that consideration of this subject will be postponed until after some disposal has been made of the woman suffrage question. There is general expectation that the Republicans will undertake to pass the suffrage amendment to the federal constitution as soon as possible after Congress assembles, for even the Senate, which has been the stumbling block. is now believed to show a majority in favor. While the Senate is occupied with the details of organization, the suffrage question, and the preliminaries to consideration of the peace treaty, the House will probably take up the supply bills, which, aggregating something like $3.-500,000,000 of appropriation, will have to be dealt with all over again, in view of the fact that the measures as put through the House in the last Congress failed of ultimate acceptance by reason of the Senate filibuster.

It is to be hoped that the anticipated passage of the suffrage amendment will meet with no obstacle. The justice of the demand is enough to warrant prompt and favorable action, but in addition it would seem that all interests would be well served by having the matter affirmatively handled and out of the way in the early days of the session. Another great question, which is similarly, to a notable degree, one that involves a moral issue, is that of the law to clear up doubtful points as to the enforcement of war-time prohibition, which is to go into effect throughout the United States and its dependencies on July 1. It will be only natural if certain forces are discovered operating to delay the needed legislation on this subject, but without doubt the Nation will watch progress in this direction with keen interest, and attention is likely to be drawn to the subject early if there is any sign of its being neglected.

There is no clear idea at this time as to what is likely to be done with the questions involving government ownership. The Postmaster-General has allowed it to be inferred that the wire systems would probably be turned back to their private owners after certain legislation has been provided, presumably of a nature to safeguard the weaker lines from competition, and perhaps to insure maintenance of service in territory where density of population is not sufficient to allow service to be maintained profitably. It appears that there is sentiment in Congress, also, that will move in the direction of having the wire lines returned. But whether any definitive action can be taken at this session concerning the disposal of the railroads is an open question. If it were merely the question whether or no the railroads should be returned to private control, the answer might be more readily forthcoming; for so far as a guess amounts to anything it may be surmised that general sentiment in and out of Congress is not yet ready to favor the government as owner and operator. What complicates the matter is the question as to how the government, while returning the lines to private ownership, shall provide for the more adequate supervision and regulation that is now quite generally accepted as necessary. There is difference of opinion on this phase of the subject even among the interests most closely identified with roads. Shippers and investors do not see eye to eye with railroad executives; one trend of sentiment would seek solution of the difficulty through establishment of a new governmental department, with perhaps a chief in the President's Cabinet, while another trend vigorously prefers that the control shall be federalized in the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission

Whatever the session does under these heads, it is to be hoped that it will not overlook any opportunity offering to reduce the burden of taxation, so far as this can be undertaken without jeopardizing any needed government activity. Taxes are at their loftiest extreme, and prices of materials and necessaries have as yet shown no appreciable diminution from those of the most exacting days of the war. Without doubt there must be opportunity now for some relief. Congress should find it.

Peru's Transcontinental Railway

Perhaps the most important industrial and commercial undertaking to be definitely taken up in South America in several years, certainly the greatest since the beginning of the Great War, is that announced by the Peruvian Government, of connecting the ports of the Pacific and the Atlantic by means of a trans-Andean railway, now being built to meet the navigable waters which flow into the Amazon. The first definite announcement of this project in the United States, so far as known, was made in April, 1917, by Senator Enrique Coronel Zegarra, of the Peruvian Congress, who sought to interest capital in the enterprise. Senator Zegarra pointed out at that time, as had previously been pointed out, the fact that the building of the proposed line, estimated at about 350 miles in length, and to cost approximately $30,000,-000, would open to the world the resources of a region immensely rich in minerals, agricultural lands, and rubber. Previous efforts to open this section had been made by Peru, as well as by Bolivia and Ecuador. Ecuador, at that time, was said to be building railroads designed to penetrate sections tributary to waterways which were affluents of the Amazon, and Bolivia was seeking to penetrate the Yungas section.

Now, however, there comes an official announcement that construction has been begun, by the Peruvian Government, of a railway traversing the sections which were to be opened by the proposed line marked out by Senator Zegarra. This line, which is to be constructed from a point on the Cerro de Pasco Railway, on the western coast, will, it is announced, if the original surveys are followed, cross the Andes at an altitude of about 8000 feet, compared with 14,000 and 15,000 feet, to which height other trans-Andean lines climb, and with the additional advantage that after the first hundred miles have been built and put in operation, freight amounting approximately to 7,000,000 tons will be available the first year. This, it is claimed, will make the initial sections of the road self-supporting from the start.

On the rouse from sea level on the western coast, across Andean mountain heights, and thence to the equatorial river country, sections rich in varied products, ranging from those of the torrid to those of the tempererate zone, will be reached. These products, besides the minerals such as gold, silver, copper, and coal, include lumber, rubber; and cotton in great quantities, as well as tropical and semi-tropical fruits and vegetables.

Up to the present time. Peru has not possessed what could be dignified by the name of a railroad system. Aside from the two railroads which have penetrated the Andean Plateau, and three short sections of longitudina! railway, the railways are short, isolated lines extending from the Pacific ports a little way up the river valleys. The eastern slope of the Andes is unconnected with the coastal regions on the west, except by difficult mountain trails, over which the transportation of freight in considerable quantities is impracticable, if not impossible. With an area of approximately 700,000 square miles. Peru has but 1700 miles of railway, or 2.5 miles to each thousand square miles of territory. It has been said that the lack of development in transportation has been due, first, to the engineering difficulties to be overcome in penetrating the mountain passes. But aside from this it is explained that development has been retarded by the great number of native Indian residents, the majority of whom are illiterate and unprogressive; the lack of political unity in governmental affairs, and the border disputes, which have caused a serious drain upon the national treasury.

It is an encouraging sign of the times, however, and an earnest of greater things in the future of Peru and her people, that these obstacles are being overcome. The expenditure of $30,000,000 upon a public project by the Peruvian Government at this time must, it would seem, be accepted as evidence of at least passively harmonious internal conditions, and certainly as proof of a determination to place the peoples, industries, and great national resources of the Republic in closer touch with the outside world. The trans-Andean railway project thus becomes not only an important constructive, but an important reconstructive undertaking, yielding visible and convincing evidence that the world is again at peace.

The Haunt of the Brook Trout

THE brook trout, by whatever specially distinguishing name the fishes of this species may be known locally, and despite slight variations in form and coloring, has selected as a congenial and desirable habitat the "spring" brooks and smaller rivers of the northern sections of the United States, and the mountain streams, and sometimes the lakes, of northern Europe and Asia. The pilgrimage to the haunt of the speckled trout, always an alluring prospect, has a special appeal during the spring and early summer months. In the sparsely-wooded pasture land of some New England farm, in the remote wastes of depleted pine forests in northern Wisconsin or Minnesota, on either slope of the Rockies in Colorado, or of the Sierras in California or Nevada, at this season of the year, the trout, of whatever variety, the eastern brook, the mountain, the steelhead, the Dolly Varden, or the blueback, invites the man or woman who loves the open. the breezes of spring, and the quiet of the half-uttered song of the brook.

Two decades and more ago, in the eastern sections of the United States, and elsewhere as far west as western Wisconsin, at least, it was said that the constant war with the fisherman had depleted the species virtually to the point of extinction, and that within a short time the brook trout would be forgotten. But it was at about that time, or soon thereafter, that attention was directed toward fish culture, especially toward the systematic culture of brook frout. While there has never been an effort, on a large scale at least, to commercialize the brook trout. in the sense of making its propagation and distribution an industry, it may be recorded that every natural habitat of the brook trout, from the woods of Maine to the mountain streams of California, today, is capable of supplying more trout than in the earlier years. This, of course, is speaking generally. Isolated and individual cases, no doubt, exist to which this sweeping assertion does not apply, but on the whole, if estimates made by those in charge of the work of distribution can be accepted as being anywhere near correct, the total number of trout in the streams has been increased many fold.

Efforts have been made, and are still being made, to domesticate the speckled trout, and many of these fishes have been domesticated, in the sense that they have been kept in artificial ponds by those who have sought to furnish fry to be planted in natural streams. But the speckled trout, domesticated, is as far removed from its environment as the eagle in the cage, or the deer in the park, and the fry thus produced and distributed differs so greatly, it is claimed, from that normally produced and reared that fish culturists in most of the states have abandoned the domestication effort.

The brook trout, in its natural haunts, knows no boundary except where the waters of the stream meet the shore. Longitudinally, as it were, the brook or stream is its domain, from source to mouth. Dams, rocks, waterfalls, and ledges are surmounted with the skill, and almost with the dexterity, of a bird. Shallow rapids are spanned, and deep, cool pools are plumbed and surveyed. Alert, resourceful far beyond the ken of many of its cousins of the firmy tribes, and sagacious, it is no wonder that those who seek the speckled trout at its best do not seek it where it is restrained, but where the waters of the brook are bluest, just below the rapids.

Notes and Comments

Something very much worth while is added to their mental image of Theodore Roosevelt by those who see the "picture" letters which he wrote to his children, and are now brought together for public exhibition at Columbia University. From wherever he might be, he kept up a correspondence with the younger Roosevelts at home. telling them what he was doing and seeing, and illustrating his letters with little pictures. This is an aspect of the former President which has not been widely known, but is not at all surprising. One remembers other men who have adorned their informal correspondence with home-made illustration, a habit, indeed, that is often the expression of a genial nature and an objective mentality. And Mr. Roosevelt becomes more likable when one thinks of him in some odd quarter of the globe busily drawing little pictures to amuse the children at home.

WITH so many worthy objects making demands upon private purses, the unostentatious but efficient way in which gentlemen in several American cities raised the money and sent distinguished painters to Paris to "do" the generals and statesmen merits congratulation. The movement, wisely conceived and quietly executed, will add important canvases to the available material when the government, as will doubtless happen, provides a national war gallery for posterity. Such a gallery will be increased in value by the inclusion of the work of modern American artists whose skill would not otherwise have been enlisted in recording this important historic period. Both the War and Navy departments have had officiallyappointed artists in Europe, whose work will naturally serve as a nucleus for any future national collection. But what these private gentlemen have done apparently prevents future regret that when so many distinguished personages gathered in Paris, so few distinguished American painters were there to paint them.

As the old ivy-covered arsenal in Central Park, New York City, passes into the possession of The Safety Institute of America, another historic reminder of war will be put to important service in the industrial life of peace. Older than Central Park itself, the arsenal was erected by the State of New York nearly seventy-five years ago. During the Civil War it was a center of military activity, after which it served various other purposes. For many years the animals of the Central Park Zoo lived and were exhibited in the basement; and in the same building the American Museum of Natural History. so much interested in earlier animals, long had its headquarters. Now it becomes the home of The Safety Institute of America, and the center of systematic effort looking to the making of American industries as safe as possible for those who are employed in them.

THE interdependence of each part of the world on the other parts makes expert explanations of the increased value of silver look like a kind of mosaic of character and events in different nations at the same time. All over the world people have hoarded silver because of their war-time distrust of paper money. India continues to demand silver because there it is not only legal tender but is prized for decorations and art work. Soldiers at the front wanted silver because they found it the most convenient currency. The mines in the western United States produced less silver because of I. W. W. activity in preventing industry. Mexico produced less silver because of internal troubles. Asia charged more for commodities for which Asian merchants insist upon being paid in silver. All of which does not increase the supply of silver, but looks very much like another argument for the expediency of united action by all the nations to prevent any one, two, or three of them from again unsettling normal conditions.

The story of the race which the projectors of the Central and Union Pacific railways engaged in from Omaha, Nebraska, and from Sacramento, California, to see which of the two could cover the greatest mileage of construction, and which culminated in the driving of the golden spike at Promontory Point, Utah, just fifty years ago, synchronizes fittingly with the trans-Atlantic flight project that is occupying so prominent a place in the thought of the public today. Moreover, when seen in relation to the cross-Channel flight of a decade ago, with the stir that it created, the events furnish an interesting object lesson on the relative rate at which the world is progressing today, compared with its rate of advance ten years and half a century ago.

Whatever may be the future of the much discussed so-called higher, drama, many theatergoers will probably agree with the critic who has boldly remarked that thus far the "higher dramatists" have not produced a wide enough range of plays to give the general public a fair chance. "It is not a fact," says this witness, "that the public dislikes a thing to be good." Unfortunately, to continue the argument, the "higher dramatists" have, for the most part, elected to write plays of peculiar gloom. To some these plays are dull, to others they are undesirable; but their failure does not argue against the possible success of equally good plays of some other genre.
